

Faith is the ability to see things that don't yet exist. You can experience something in your "knower", and time will often reveal that you were right. But many times, we don't act on our belief by living out what we "know" or envision, and therefore we don't take an action, even when we know it is for our own good. Sometime later, we see that opportunity being enjoyed by someone else and we experience the emotional pain of having missed out. We fight the urging to be regretful, and sadly tell our friends at dinner the story of how we should have pulled the trigger.

Take, as an example, the building of a house. One might say is it possible to see this house before it was here? The answer is, emphatically "yes". If somebody had not seen it when it was not here, then it would have never been here. Someone saw it while the lot was vacant. It is possible to "see" things that don't exist.

Well then, the question is "When should you start building the house?"...a good philosophical pondering. And here's the answer. As soon as you finish it. You wouldn't start building the house until you had it finished. If you just started laying bricks, and somebody came around and said, What are you doing? And you say, 'I'm just laying bricks". And they said, What are you building? And you said, I have no idea. They would immediately walk away from you concerned.

Likewise, changes in an investment market cycle cannot always be evidenced physically. Facts will build the platform for a decision. And then, by a measure of faith, an investment decision is made. Meanwhile, you know that the stock market is overheated, and the stimulus distributions have largely been spent. You also 'know' that people would prefer to live indoors.

As you read the article below, know that it is reporting on what has already happened. It shows the market was overheated, prices on multifamily real estate and other real estate product types went up significantly due to a lot of money chasing after a limited supply of goods.

But also "know" that you are able to "see" the next market cycle and benefit from your vision. Using history and the law of averages, we know that a down cycle must follow an up cycle. And a Seller's market will eventually become a Buyer's market.

VisionWise Capital "sees" a Buyer's market in the making. The overheated economy we have experienced in multifamily properties is fading rapidly as the money driving up prices is drying up. The next cycle will be a sell-off by those who missed the highpoint in the Seller's cycle, and are now stressed for possibly missing out on the deferral of capital gains taxes imbedded in the potentially fading tax code known as IRS 1031.

Join me this spring and summer. Make a decision to follow what you know is true, that real estate is a lasting and very profitable asset class in every cycle.

VisionWise Capital is gearing up to acquire as many properties as make good sense to buy. Some outstanding properties, buildings that have not been put on the market for decades, are being made available for sale. With an aging ownership, and a next generation that prefers to have cash more than the operating hassles of income property, we are anticipating this year to be a market cycle that we “know” and can “envision” being a record-breaking year for those who act on their vision by fact, empowered by faith.
